Research Analysis

SB 1853 provides that if a parent is incarcerated for more than 180 consecutive days, the child support obligation will be computed on the basis of actual monthly gross income. The court may impute gross income if: the obligor has the means to pay support while incarcerated (or while permanently physically or mentally incapacitated); the obligor is incarcerated for an offense against the custodial parent or child; or the incarceration is due to the obligors' failure to comply with court-ordered child support.
